A GREAT JOURNAL'S HOME. The New Building of The New York Times,

Now Nearing Completion.

The new building now being rapidly pushed to completion for The New York Times, in New York city, is designed to be one of the finest newspaper buildings in the world. It is already many stories high, and is built partly of magnificent white granite and partly of Indiana sandstone, which giftens brightly in the sunlight, and makes the tow-ering brick buildings surrounding it look site of the new building at all; on the conthe new one is being erected without in the least disturbing the plant of the newspaper office. This is a clear feat of extinsering, which is quits frequently performed in New York city. The walls of the old building were completely toru away, disclosing to view temporary wells of wood, covered with terred paper and the, and the numerous floors were braced and held in position by beavy scaffoldings under each, which were gradually taken away as the new walls made order on short hoth distribut the new floors were put in, starting from the top and going downwards, then anabling the office to continue its business
